WALKTHROUGH SCRIPT · MONDAY

Adyen × F1: Monday walkthrough with Mark (Chairman deck 9)

Who it's for. You, walking Mark through the deck before he takes it to Peter. Bjorn is in the room for questions, the Airwallex story and Ferrari. Tom (hospitality) isn't. If it's confirmed, a 30-minute virtual call with Ferrari follows.

The goal. Send Mark into Peter's office with an objective business case, not a passion play. Eleri's line: Peter doesn't need persuading to love F1. He needs a business case he can defend.

The spine. Everything below comes back to three sentences:

1. F1 isn't a payments-volume play. If volume were the goal, football is cheaper and easier to buy.
2. F1 is white space and always on: 2 of the 32 sports deals Adyen's rivals hold, and 10 racing months a year across five continents.
3. One partnership does several jobs: a live case study, a global hospitality programme that pays for itself, and a partner network full of prospects.

Time plan (45 minutes). About 30 minutes of us, 15 of Mark. If time runs short, protect parts 1, 3 and 5.

How to read it. Land it is the headline the slide must leave behind. Say is how you'd put it. Insight is the point that adds value. Ask Mark is where you stop talking. Lines in italics are cues.

Part 0 · Frame the meeting (3 min)

1 Open

KEY SLIDE

Say: Mark, thanks for the time. One goal today: get you ready for Peter. You know Adyen and you know Peter; our job is to give you the business case, the proof, and the answers to the questions he'll ask.

Three ground rules. First, we're not the rights holders, so we won't have every answer today. Anything we can't answer, we'll get to you before you see Peter. Second, hospitality detail is Tom's area, and he isn't here today. We've put examples in the deck, and the full hospitality deck is yours if it helps. Third, we want you talking more than us. Stop us anywhere.

Then frame F1 in one breath:

Brands aren't in F1 for exposure; the logo on the car is the least interesting part. They're there to prove their technology under pressure, in front of the world, and to be in the room with the people they want as clients. And because each partner owns its category, the brands next to you in the paddock aren't competitors. They're prospects.

Ask Mark: Before we start, what's your read on Peter right now? When you picture him looking at this, what's the first thing he pushes back on?

Listen. Note his answer. Every slide that follows should land against it.

Part 1 · Why F1, as a business case (12 min)

2 Adyen's brief

KEY SLIDE

Land it: F1 hits five of Adyen's priorities with one partnership, and the last one is already in your brief.

Say: This is your team's brief, in five boxes. Payment integration first: Adyen running inside a team's business, as a working product. Then a global brand, client relationships, and commercial growth.

Look at the fifth box. One global programme, uniting local hosting across eight to ten races. You already host at races, country by country. That box is the economic case for doing it centrally: one budget, one standard, more leverage.

> Insight: The headline on this slide still says "financial efficiencies". Eleri's point is that's not the story Peter needs. The story is the B2B one: every touchpoint where Adyen meets a client, a prospect or a partner.

Ask Mark: Of these five, which one does Peter care about most personally? Which one would make him lean in?

3 Competitive landscape

KEY SLIDE

Land it: Your rivals crowd football and the US leagues. F1 is still open.

Say: Each dot is one sports deal held by a payments company. Seven companies, 32 deals. Football has 11, US leagues 12. F1 has two: Stripe with Mercedes and Airwallex with McLaren.

> Insight: Two things make F1 different. First, white space: almost nobody in payments is there yet. Second, it's always on. Football and US leagues run on matchdays and seasons, so concession and merchandise volume comes in bursts. F1 runs for ten months a year,

> March to December, across five continents. That's a story Adyen can tell every week, not every other weekend.

Cue: Eleri noted Adyen itself is active only in football. If Mark confirms it, ask the next question.

Ask Mark: Adyen's own sports work is in football. What has it delivered for you, and what hasn't it? That tells us what F1 needs to do differently.

4 Why F1, at a glance

KEY SLIDE

Land it: One platform puts Adyen in front of its buyers, in its markets, all year.

Say: Six facts. F1 is the number one sport, of the five we compared, for all five audiences Adyen sells to. 625 million followers, up 31% in four years. Half the world's most valuable brands are involved. 457 million fans in Adyen's own office markets. 24 race weekends. And 371 partners across the eleven teams.

> Insight: The number to remember for Peter isn't the audience, it's the network. 125 new F1 sponsorship deals were signed in 2025, up 29%. More brands are joining every year, and each new one is a potential client sitting in the same paddock.

5 Executive summary: three routes

Land it: Two proposals on the table, one option in reserve. Today's decision is F1, not a contract.

Say: Max: reach, influence and a business Adyen can power. Alpine: the full team platform, exclusive category, with Adyen running the team's online store. Ferrari: the biggest pool of finance-sector fans, no proposal yet. We'll come back to each one. For now, the point for Peter is that there's more than one way in.

Ask Mark: If you had to walk into Peter's office with one route, which would it be today, and why?

Don't debate it yet. Note the answer and come back to it in part 4.

6 The audience

KEY SLIDE

Land it: F1 fans are the people who sign Adyen's contracts and the consumers who try new ways to pay first.

Say: We compared five sports on five audiences that matter to Adyen. F1 wins all five. Early tech adopters are 31% ahead of the next-best sport; senior decision-makers, 12% ahead.

> Insight: That's both sides of Adyen's business in one audience: the enterprise buyer and > the early adopter. Few sports give you both.

Ask Mark: Who is Adyen's hardest buyer to reach today: the CFO, the CTO, or the head of ecommerce?

7 Growth (optional)

Eleri suggests skipping this one: slide 4 already makes the growth point. If you show it, one line only: the audience keeps growing, and so does the number of brands paying to be there. That's why the timing matters.

8 Business leader network

KEY SLIDE

Land it: If F1's brands were a country, only the US and China would be bigger.

Say: Half the world's most valuable brands are in F1. The public companies alone have $10 trillion in combined revenue: more than the GDP of Germany, Japan, India, the UK or France.

> Insight: That's public companies only. Add the private ones and the number goes up. Five of the Magnificent Seven are in this room. For Adyen, this isn't an audience to advertise to. It's a client list.

Ask Mark: Which ten logos on this wall would Peter most like to see as Adyen merchants?

9 Brand value

Land it: The strongest brands outperform, and two of them got their biggest lift the year they joined F1.

Say: Kantar's strongest brands returned 504% over twenty years, against 451% for the S&P 500. And IBM and American Express both posted their biggest brand-value gains in the year they entered F1.

Eleri sees this as one of the strongest slides. If time is tight, show it before the audience slide.

10 Footprint

KEY SLIDE

Land it: F1 goes where Adyen does business, including the markets you're trying to grow.

Say: Your 28 offices, next to the 24 races. Every region with an Adyen office has a race, except India. 457 million fans live in your 22 office markets, up a third since 2022.

> Insight: Look at the growth markets. India has 117 million fans and nearly doubled since 2022, without a Grand Prix. The US is up 74%; Japan is up 41%. F1 reaches markets few other sports do, and it's growing fastest where Adyen wants to grow.

Cue: there's talk of a future race in India. Mention it only as talk, and don't promise it.

Ask Mark: Which markets are on Peter's growth list for the next three years? We'll map the races to them.

Part 2 · F1 pays for itself (7 min)

11 Hospitality

KEY SLIDE

Land it: Hospitality is how the partnership pays for itself.

Say: Picture it: a Saturday in Singapore, your top ten merchants and five prospects in one suite, the CEO of a target account next to you on the pit wall. That's what hospitality does. It keeps clients, it builds pipeline, and it brings in new merchants.

> Insight: This is the economic heart of the case. The partnership isn't paid for by brand metrics; it's paid for by the deals that close in these rooms.

Talk through the proof verbally; slide 12 is confidential (see below): Komatsu took more than $100 million in orders at races with Williams. HPE's CEO says race activations alone accelerated more than $300 million in revenue opportunity. Businessolver, an Alpine partner, puts $122 million of pipeline down to hosting at the track.

Ask Mark: What does Adyen spend on hosting today, roughly, and where? If we can pull that spend into one programme, the partnership starts to fund itself.

Cue: the hospitality brief is still open. This question gets us most of what it asks.

12 Case studies (hide)

Eleri suggests hiding this slide: the source decks are marked highly confidential. Use the numbers verbally on slide 11 and don't leave them on screen.

13 Team partnership network

KEY SLIDE

Land it: Partnering a team gives Adyen a network of new-business prospects.

Say: Every team comes with a partner portfolio. At Alpine that's 49 partners with $390 billion in revenue, led by Boeing, Eni and Renault, with Gucci as title partner from 2027. At Ferrari, 42 partners and $568 billion: Shell, IBM, HP.

> Insight: Every one of these partners takes payments somewhere. The network is a pipeline, and the team makes the introductions; Alpine's offer includes a partner forum built for exactly that.

Ask Mark: Which of these would you call first?

Part 3 · Where Adyen wins (7 min)

15 Adyen wouldn't be following

KEY SLIDE

Land it: Adyen wouldn't be following its rivals. It would take a better seat.

Say: Stripe partners Mercedes. Airwallex runs McLaren's supplier payments, behind the scenes. Adyen's seat would be the commerce fans actually see and use: Alpine's store, Verstappen Travel's tickets, Tap to Pay at Max's trailers.

> Insight: Peter won't want to copy competitors, and this isn't copying. It's the visible version of what they do: Adyen's product working live, in front of fans and clients.

16 How a payments peer uses F1

KEY SLIDE

Land it: Airwallex turned one F1 integration into an enterprise sales machine.

Say: Three steps. One, it ran a real problem: McLaren's supplier payments across 24 race locations, live in 14 days. Two, it proved it: 90% of payments now arrive within hours. Three, it sold the story: told to customers in F1 hospitality, on track and off, and used to build new business through McLaren's partners.

Hand to Bjorn: "Bjorn was close to this one."

Ask Mark: What would a case study need to show for your sales team to actually use it?

17 We've done this before

Say: And we built that playbook. SPORTFIVE took Airwallex and McLaren from first idea to board decision. One line; Bjorn can add colour.

18 Where Adyen sits in the business

Land it: Integration first, not a logo deal.

Say: Four steps on Adyen's own value chain. Power: Adyen runs the partner's payments. Prove: live data becomes a case study. Host: hospitality at the centre. Connect: the partner network becomes pipeline. That's the test we apply to every route.

Part 4 · The routes (12 min)

19 Three routes into F1

KEY SLIDE

Land it: Start with one route, prove it, then grow.

Say: Max and Alpine came out of conversations already under way. Ferrari is the option we're opening. The plan at the bottom matters more than the choice: start, prove, expand.

> Insight: Once Peter buys F1, the routes can change. If none of these is right, there are others, Red Bull among them. The first decision is F1; the route comes second.

20 Max Verstappen

KEY SLIDE

Land it: Max is a positioning play: two Dutch innovators, and a business Adyen can power.

Say: Max isn't just a four-time champion. He's built a business around himself: travel, a shop, GT3 racing, sim racing, a simulation centre, an app. Adyen exists to power businesses like that.

> Insight: Be straight with Peter: this isn't a volume play. Grandstand ticketing and trackside sales are real, but small. The value is the story: the most popular driver on the grid, building a business on Adyen.

21 Powering Verstappen.com

Say: Verstappen Travel first: grandstand tickets and trackside trailers. The online store is off the table; Fanatics runs it.

Cue: we've asked Max's team for grandstand ticketing volumes and are still waiting. If Mark asks, say so and promise numbers before Peter.

22 Max rights package

Land it: A first draft, not a final package.

Say: It's a starting point to shape around Adyen. The fee range is €5–8 million a year depending on the rights.

> Insight: Rough numbers from Eleri, for you, not the slide: the package as drafted is about €8 million, roughly €9 million with hospitality. Drop the GT3 branding and it's about €5 million, €5.5–6 million with hospitality.

Ask Mark: Which matters more to Peter here: Max's name on Adyen, or Adyen inside Max's business?

23 Hospitality bundle

Land it: Bring the hospitality budget you already spend into one tailored programme.

Say: Max's package is light on F1 hospitality, so we'd build it in: race weekends, off-track experiences, travel and guests handled end to end. Not new money; budget Adyen already spends, used better.

25–28 Hospitality examples

Flick through: Miami packages, the Austin programme, off-track ideas, our services. Say it's Tom's area, offer the full hospitality deck, and ask for the brief.

Ask Mark: Which three races would you pick for Adyen's first year?

29 Alpine

KEY SLIDE

Land it: A team with pedigree, entering its biggest commercial era.

Say: Enstone, Alpine's home, has won seven world championships: Schumacher with Benetton, Alonso with Renault. From 2027 it races as Gucci Racing Alpine. Renault Group's CEO calls F1 core strategy. And the offer to Adyen is exclusive: the only financial technology platform on the car.

30 Alpine's fans

Land it: Alpine's fans are Adyen's customer list.

Say: 63.6 million fans. 26.8 million decision-makers, one in ten C-suite. Alpine's two strongest fan groups are executive purchasers, at 3.9 times the average person, and early adopters of new tech, at three times.

31 Alpine makes partnerships pay

Say: 90% of guests at the Alpine Lodge say they're more likely to do business with their host. And Alpine's campaigns travel: 9.8 million impressions for Eni from one race, 6 million for Xbox from one weekend.

Ask Mark: Exclusive at Alpine or non-exclusive with Max: how much is exclusivity worth to Peter?

32–33 Alpine plan and rights

Don't walk through the detail. One line: Alpine's plan follows the same four steps, power, prove, host, connect, and the full rights are there for reference.

34 Ferrari

Say: No proposal yet. We're waiting on the NDA so Ferrari can share information. The aim of today's Ferrari call is to give you enough to talk to them yourself.

Ask Mark: Where are we on the NDA? If we can get it signed this week, Ferrari can share figures before you see Peter.

Part 5 · Send Mark in ready (5 min)

35 Next steps KEY SLIDE

Say: Six steps: your review with Peter, feedback, refine the rights, decide on Ferrari, contract and integration plan, launch.

Ask Mark: What do you need from us before you see Peter? Numbers, a shorter version of the deck, or a rehearsal?

Ask Mark: After Peter says yes, who else at Adyen should be in the room?

The 90-second version for Peter

Offer Mark this, word for word if he wants it:

"Peter, this isn't about payment volume. If it were, football would be cheaper. F1 is the one premium sport our rivals haven't crowded: two of their 32 sports deals. And it's on ten months a year, in our markets, in front of our buyers.

One partnership does three jobs. Our product runs live inside a team's or a driver's business, and that becomes the case study our sales teams use. We host our clients and prospects at races, through one global programme instead of country by country, and that's how it pays for itself. And we join a partner network full of companies that should be Adyen merchants.

There are two proposals on the table, Max and Alpine, and Ferrari is opening up. The decision today isn't which contract. It's whether F1 is the right platform for Adyen."

Questions to have ready

"What's the payment volume?"

Honest answer: modest, and it isn't the headline. Max's ticketing volumes are on request. The value is the case study, the hosting and the network.

"Why not just do more football?"

For volume, football is cheaper and more accessible. But it's crowded with Adyen's rivals, seasonal, and doesn't put Adyen in a room with this calibre of buyer every weekend for ten months.

"Aren't we following Stripe and Airwallex?"

No: they're behind the scenes or on a logo. Adyen's seat is the commerce fans see, live at the races.

"What does it cost?"

Max: €5–8M a year depending on rights (as drafted, about €8M, roughly €9M with hospitality; about €5M without GT3 branding). Alpine: £10M in 2027, rising 5% a year, with 56 Paddock Club tickets included.

"What do we get back?"

Pipeline from hosting (proof points: Komatsu, HPE, Businessolver; keep them verbal), a case study sales can use, introductions to the team's partners, and brand lift in the markets Adyen is growing in.

"What if Peter likes F1 but not these routes?"

Then we look at others, Red Bull among them. The first decision is F1.

"Can you answer X?"

If it's a rights-holder question, we'll get the answer to you before you see Peter.
