TALKING SCRIPT · MONCLER

Moncler × Formula 1: talking script

1 Opening

Thank you for your time today. It is good to see you again.

In our first conversation, you told us about Moncler: where the brand is today, and where you want to take it. What we show today is based on that first conversation. These are our initial findings.

But today is not only about our findings. We also want to update the brief with you, and define it more clearly. The clearer the brief, the better we can refine our recommendations for Moncler.

The meeting has three parts.

Part one: why Formula 1. What the sport is today, who the fans are, and why it fits Moncler.

Part two: our initial recommendations. Why we suggest a driver, then four drivers and three teams.

Part three: next steps, and how we refine the brief together.

It takes about thirty minutes. Please stop us at any time.

This is not a final offer. It is a first direction. If something does not feel right for Moncler, please tell us. Your feedback today goes straight into the brief.

Ask Moncler: Before we start: has anything changed on your side since we last spoke?

Part 1 · Why Formula 1 (slides 2–11, about 10 minutes)

2 The opportunity

Let me start with the idea in one sentence. Formula 1 offers Moncler a credible route into one of the most visible cultural and sporting worlds.

Two words matter here: visible, and credible.

Visible first. F1 is no longer only a sport. The Netflix series Drive to Survive, and the F1 film with Brad Pitt in 2025, brought it to people who had never watched a race. The season travels across Europe, Asia, the Americas and Australia. And luxury has noticed. In 2025, LVMH started a ten-year global partnership with Formula 1, with Louis Vuitton, Moët Hennessy and TAG Heuer.

Credible is the harder part. Many fashion brands now appear around F1. Some look like guests. Others look like they belong. The difference is not the budget. It is the fit, and how long you stay.

So our question was not "how can Moncler be seen in F1?" Our question was "how can Moncler belong there?"

3 The idea

Here is our answer. The opportunity is not simply to place product in the paddock. It is to use a driver as a year-round cultural connector.

Why not just product in the paddock? Because many brands already send clothes to drivers. It gives you a photo, once. It does not give you a story, and it does not last.

A connector is different. The slide names four places where a driver can bring Moncler Collection.

Travel. More than twenty races a year, around the world. Airports, flights, hotels.

City life. Race week does not happen only at the circuit. It happens in the city: Miami, Shanghai, Singapore, Las Vegas, Monaco. The restaurants, the events, the stores.

Race-week style. The arrival at the circuit, photographed at every race.

And the personal moments around elite performance. The preparation, the training, the quiet minutes before and after a race. That is where the most honest images come from.

One more practical point. The season runs from March to December. So one driver covers both your spring-summer and your autumn-winter collections. Las Vegas, for example, races at night in November, when the desert is cold.

4 The objective

This is the objective, as we understood it from our first conversation. Position Moncler Collection within globally relevant cultural and sporting moments, while introducing the brand to communities beyond its established client base.

It has two halves, and each half needs something different.

The first half is about where Moncler is seen: in moments that matter around the world, not only in your own stores and shows. Here we would measure the quality of the moments, and the coverage in fashion and sport media.

The second half is about who sees it: new people, beyond your current clients. Here we would measure new clients: how many, how young, and in which markets.

Now look at the products on this slide. Knitwear, a long parka, short down jackets, a wool zip-up, a cardigan. Beanies, bags and boots. Three looks for men, three for women. This is not one product. It is a full wardrobe. And a driver's week needs all of it: the cold morning at the circuit, the flight, the dinner in the city.

The balance between men and women matters too. 42% of F1 fans are women. So this is not only a men's story.

Everything after this slide answers this objective.

Ask Moncler: Did we understand the objective correctly? Would you change anything?

---

5 Why Formula One?

So, part one. Why Formula 1?

---

6 What F1 has become

Formula 1 has changed. Today it is sport, fashion, travel, technology and entertainment together. And much of the story is told on social media first.

One moment shows this clearly: the paddock walk. The drivers arrive at the circuit, and the photographers are waiting, like at a fashion show. It happens at every race weekend.

---

7 Scale

Four numbers.

827 million fans around the world. That is 63% more than in 2018.

43% of them are under 35.

42% are women. In 2018, it was 37%.

And 6.7 million people went to the races in 2025. That is a record.

For Moncler, the two numbers in the middle matter most: young people, and women. We see them as the luxury clients of the next ten years.

The last number matters too. These are real people who travel to a city for a race weekend. And many race cities are also important luxury cities: Miami, Las Vegas, Shanghai, Singapore, Monaco.

So F1 gives you two things together: global reach on screens, and physical moments in key cities.

---

8 The audience

The message of this slide: compared with football and basketball, F1 has the highest concentration of affluent, premium-minded and fashion-conscious fans. 100 is the average person.

On all four measures, F1 fans are ahead of both: interest in fashion, buying premium, paying more for quality, and high income.

The biggest gap is in buying the premium version of a product. F1 fans are at 132. Football fans are at 112. That is about twenty points.

Why does this matter? Income tells you what people can spend. This number tells you what they choose to buy. For a premium brand, the choice matters more.

To be fair, on paying more for quality the difference is small: 108 against 104. The real case is fashion interest, premium buying and income.

Ask Moncler: Does this match your own client data? Where are you strong today, and where do you want to grow?

9–11 Five reasons

Five reasons why this fits Moncler.

One: culture. A race weekend is now a cultural event: fashion, music, hospitality and nightlife.

Two: a new luxury audience. Younger, and more balanced between men and women. Moncler can reach them without changing its premium position.

Three: stories all year. Every race weekend is a moment. Between the races, the driver's travel and training keep the story going.

Four: global and local. One idea for the whole world, activated only where you choose: your markets, your stores. There are three races in the United States, and races in China, Japan and Singapore.

Five: commercial receptivity. In simple words, fans welcome partners. In the 2025 Global F1 Fan Survey, by Formula 1 and Motorsport Network, 76% of fans said sponsors make the F1 experience better. Three out of four. The condition is that the partnership feels authentic. That is why we focus on fit, not only on visibility.

Ask Moncler: Which markets or stores would you start with?

That was part one. Now part two: our recommendations.

Part 2 · Our recommendations (slides 12–26, about 15 minutes)

---

12 Why partner with an F1 driver?

There are three ways into F1: the sport itself, a team, or a driver.

Our recommendation is to start with a driver. A team can be added. Here is why, in five short points.

13 A human point of view

A driver gives Moncler a recognisable human point of view inside Formula 1.

A logo can be seen. But it cannot wear a jacket, travel, or tell a story. The right driver can wear, interpret and narrate the brand, across racing, travel and culture. That turns a global platform into a personal and credible story.

There is also a practical reason. Inside the circuit, drivers mostly wear team clothing. The arrival is different. What a driver wears on arrival is usually a personal choice, and it is photographed at every race. For a fashion brand, that is the moment that matters.

Moncler already knows this way of thinking. With Project Mondo G, a Mercedes-Benz G-Class became a Moncler piece. A driver is the same idea, with a person.

14 Authentic integration

With a driver, Moncler does not need to create moments. They already exist: the arrival at the circuit, the flight to the next race, a client event, a fashion week.

Moncler is there, worn by the same person each time. Nothing looks staged. That is what makes it credible.

15 Human storytelling

Drivers live with ambition, resilience and excellence. Moncler is built on the same values.

A driver's career has years of work, risk, wins and losses. People follow that story. Moncler's heritage, craft and performance can live inside it.

16 A 365-day platform

A sponsor is visible on race weekends. A driver is visible all year: races, training, travel, interviews, fashion weeks and store openings. Also in the winter months, when there are no races.

17 People connect with people

People build relationships with people, not with logos. A driver gives Moncler a face that many people already follow. That brings new audiences to the brand.

Ask Moncler: How do you work with ambassadors today? And how do you measure whether it works?

18 Driver recommendations

We chose four drivers. Two are established. Two are young.

The real choice is about time. With an established driver, you pay for recognition today. With a young driver, you pay less today and share the growth. The risk is that a young career may not grow as expected. Both are valid. It depends on your objective.

Availability and existing contracts are not checked yet. We check first, then we confirm.

19 Carlos Sainz

Carlos Sainz. You know Carlos from four seasons at Ferrari.

A race winner, and one of the most respected drivers in the paddock. Precise, resilient and consistent. The style is polished but understated, with global appeal: quality that does not follow trends. And a real connection to travel and performance.

Carlos now drives for Williams, with a multi-year contract. Williams is also one of the teams we recommend. I will come back to that.

20 Charles Leclerc

Charles Leclerc. Ferrari driver, born in Monaco. In Italy, no introduction is needed.

Charles is one of the most recognised faces in F1, with an elegant image and real credibility in fashion. Charles moves easily between the circuit, luxury events and fashion editorials. That is Moncler's own mix: performance, innovation and elevated style.

For Moncler: very strong recognition from the first day. Recognition at this level comes at a higher price.

21 Arvid Lindblad

Arvid Lindblad. This is Arvid's first season in F1, with Racing Bulls. One of the most promising young drivers in the sport.

Ambitious, and not afraid to do things differently. Arvid's background is multicultural, and the outlook is modern.

For Moncler: a long-term partnership. Moncler could be there from the beginning, connecting the brand's heritage with the future of sport and culture.

22 Oliver Bearman

Oliver Bearman drives for Haas. A fast rise through motorsport, which shows determination and adaptability.

Oliver connects well with younger audiences, is growing in fashion, and is natural in front of the camera.

For Moncler: a younger, modern face for the brand's sporting heritage.

So: Carlos and Charles for recognition now. Arvid and Oliver for a story that grows over time. Some brands choose one of each.

Ask Moncler: Which of the four feels closest to Moncler? One face, or two?

---

23 Team recommendations

Now the teams. A simple way to see the difference: a driver gives you a face. A team gives you a place: hospitality, the paddock, the garage, and the team's name and images for your campaigns and stores.

We recommend three teams. They are three different deals. In general, the more successful the team, the higher the price, and the less room you have to shape the partnership.

---

24 McLaren

McLaren. One of the oldest teams in F1, based in Woking, in England. Team champions in 2024 and 2025, and Lando Norris won the 2025 drivers' title. The drivers are Lando Norris and Oscar Piastri.

This season, with the new rules, Mercedes has been the strongest team. But McLaren is still one of the most commercially active brands in the sport, with young, fashion-aware fans and experience with lifestyle and apparel partners.

For Moncler: a link with a recent champion. The trade-off: many partners already, and a premium price.

---

25 Audi

Audi. A new team, in its first season. Moncler would not be one name among many. Moncler could be a founding luxury partner.

The team is based in Hinwil, in Switzerland. European design, precise engineering, and the Alps: a natural fit with Moncler Grenoble.

The trade-off: a new team needs time to win.

---

26 Williams

Williams. A historic British team from Grove, founded in 1977. The team principal is James Vowles. The drivers are Carlos Sainz and Alex Albon.

Williams brings heritage, and a comeback story. 2026 has been a difficult season for the team. That is part of a long rebuild, with strong investment. It is also one reason the entry price is lower than at a top team. For Moncler, that means more visibility for the money, and more say in how the partnership looks.

And Carlos, who has a strong personal style, drives for Williams. So the team and the driver could be one story.

So, three options: join a recent champion, be a founder, or shape a comeback.

Ask Moncler: Driver, team, or both? And which option is closest to how Moncler likes to work?

That was part two. Now part three: next steps.

Part 3 · Next steps (slides 27–28, about 5 minutes)

---

27 The close

To summarise. F1 is a global platform where performance, style and modern culture meet.

With the right driver, Moncler is not only a sponsor. Moncler becomes part of how the sport looks, all year.

---

28 Next steps

Three steps.

One: we update the brief together, with your feedback from today. Which drivers, which teams, which direction.

Two: we check your short list: availability, existing contracts, the exact category, and the cost.

Three: we come back with refined recommendations and a proposal for Moncler.

Our work costs you nothing. The teams pay our fee.

We would also like to invite you to a Grand Prix as our guests, to see the paddock with these options in mind.

Ask Moncler: Who else at Moncler should be in the next conversation? And is there a date we should work towards: a show, a launch, a store opening?

Thank you. Grazie.